

田字格 Character Practice Pack

Blank writing grids, and a traced sheet for every character in HSK 1–3

ThePureLanguage

田字格 — "field-character grid" — is the paper Chinese children learn to write on. The cross splits the square into four quadrants so the parts of a character land where they belong. Blank sheets first, then a traced row for each of the 617 characters HSK 1 to 3 uses.

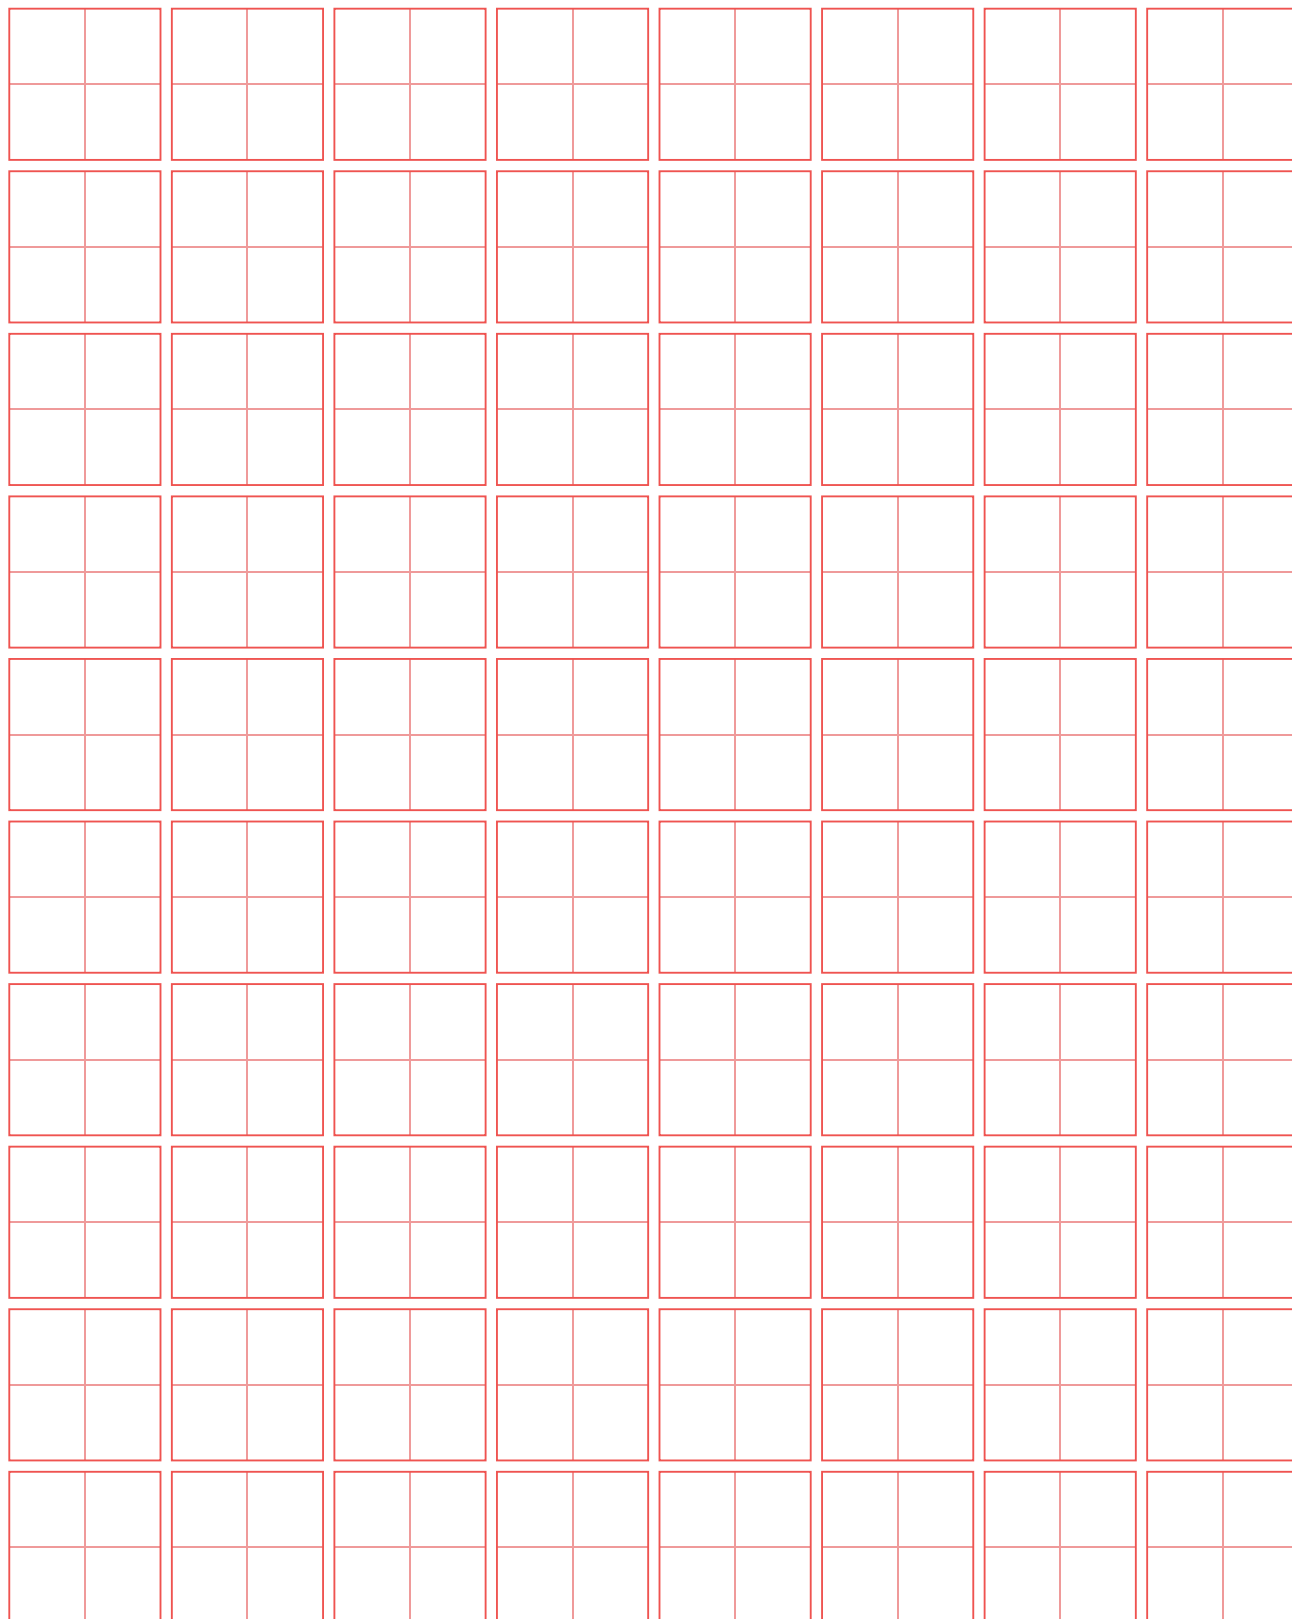

- Trace the grey character three times slowly, then write it in the empty squares without looking back. Copying is not the exercise; the empty squares are.
- Keep the parts inside their quadrants. That is the whole reason the grid has a cross in it, and it is what stops a character drifting into a lopsided shape you then have to unlearn.
- Stroke order is not printed here — there is nowhere on a grid to put it. Watch any character animate on the site, then come back to the paper.

Built from the character practice sheet generator at thepurelanguage.com/CharacterPracticeSheets, and updated when that page is.

Blank grid — 20 mm

The size to start on. Big enough that an eight-stroke character does not turn into a smudge.

Blank grid — 15 mm

The everyday size, once the shapes are familiar. This is the ruling the traced pages use.

Blank grid — 12 mm

For revision at speed, and about as small as handwriting stays readable on ordinary paper.

Blank grid with a pinyin line

Write the reading above the row, then the character below it. Doing both together is what stops a character being learned as a shape with no sound attached.

HSK 1 characters — 174 of them

Trace the grey character, then write it in the empty squares without looking back.
